Southern Arizona was a focal point of the late nineteenth century Apache wars. In the early years of the wars, conflicts resulted from Apache raids and settler reprisals that escalated into a cycle of violence that made southern Arizona a dangerous place to live, for settlers and Apaches alike. From 1875 to 1886, the US Army intervened to force the Apaches onto reservations. After 1886, and as late as 1906, minor skirmishes occurred between the U.S. Cavalry, settlers, and small groups of Apache who had evaded the reservations.

Join Neil Mangum on this fascinating trek to some of the pivotal sites in the Apache Wars, including Cochise Stronghold, Fort Bowie, Camp Grant, Fort Huachuca, Fort Lowell, and more. Neil is a historian, author, and a former park superintendent at Little Bighorn Battlefield National Monument and Chiricahua National Monument.
